DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Mar-Jo Lodge is located on a private drive off Turkey Neck Road, on Turkey Neck near the southern end of Deep Creek Lake. The house is screened from the road by woods and rhododendrons. At the front of the house, lawns roll gently down to the edge of the lake.

The house is a one-story, gable-roofed dwelling built of unhewn chestnut logs on a native stone foundation. The facade points NW. The land slopes down from SE to NW, creating a full basement story under the facade.

The building's core is a four-bay-long by one-bay-deep rectangle. One-bay square perpendicular sections extend from the north end of the facade and the south end of the rear. The southern ell is covered by a gable roof. A screened porch adjoining the north ell covers the remainder of the facade. The ell and the central section of the porch share a shed roof, while the west end of the porch is covered with a gable roof.

All windows have two sliding panes. The lodge has three entrances: one at the northeast end of the rear, one just northeast of center on the facade, and a set of double doors opening onto the porch from the SW elevation of the north ell. A door in the center of the porch's gable end opens to a flight of wooden steps running down to the lawn. The house has a single interior stone fireplace chimney located centrally between the two northeastern bays.

The porch is supported by stone pillars. The area under the west end of the porch was enclosed at a later date to form a store room. This log construction is compatible with the original building. A door occupies the westernmost of the three remaining cellar bays on the northwest wall under the porch. In the central and easternmost bays of this elevation are double casement windows. Each casement contains nine lights. On the store room, a double door fills the southwest elevation and a single door is placed on the northeast elevation.

The log walls are V-notched at the corners. The log ends extend approximately a foot beyond the corner and have been trimmed at various angles for a consciously rustic effect. The logs have been painted black and the cement daubing is white. Four logs continue around the porch to enclose it to a c.3' height. Log posts rising above this balustrade retain stubs of branches. An exposed log "W" - shaped roof truss supports the porch gable.

The window frames have been painted yellow. The roof is covered with asphalt shingles.

The central portion of the house contains the living room. Northeast of the living room in the east corner of the house is the kitchen. The

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Mar-Jo Lodge achieves significance in two ways: historically as the site of the 1946 western Maryland vacation of Dr. Albert Einstein, and architecturally as an excellent example of log vacation architecture of the 1920's. Dr. Einstein vacationed here for two weeks in September 1946 at the invitation of Dr. Frank Wilson, a Cumberland physician and friend of the physicist. Wilson constructed the house in the mid-1920's as a summer retreat and named it for his two daughters, Marjorie and Josephine. Outstanding features of the house include its log construction the cantilevered living room stair case, half-log cupboard doors, and rustic setting.

History and Support

In September of 1946, Dr. Albert Einstein accepted the invitation of Dr. Frank Wilson to vacation in his lodge on Deep Creek Lake. Einstein and Wilson knew each other, according to the lodge's present owner, because Dr. Wilson owned a large supply of radium, a radioactive mineral used in research. At this time, Einstein had recently completed employment with the Department of the Navy as Consultant for Research on Explosives, and was president and chairman of trustees of the Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists, an organization formed to help "guide the public into the nuclear age."¹ There is no reason to believe that this was any more than a simple respite from Einstein's administrative and scientific duties. The then-caretaker of Mar-Jo Lodge, Blair Thompson, reported a very simple routine of meals, newspapers, letters, and visitors for the two-week period.²

Little is known of Dr. Wilson except that he was a prominent Cumberland physician who bought the property along Deep Creek Lake in 1937 and hired a man named Bowers to construct the house. The house exhibits extreme care in its construction and craftsmanly attention to detail, especially in the staircase and cabinets. Wilson died of cancer sometime afterward and left the lodge to relatives, who sold it in 1953. The Rodericks have owned the lodge since 1976.

Mar-Jo Lodge
(Con't #7 - Description)

dining room occupies the northern ell, northwest of the kitchen southwest of the living room in the southern ell is the master bedroom, and northwest of the master bedroom are a bath and a smaller bedroom.

The livingroom exhibits a massive stone fireplace on the NE wall. Of special interest is the staircase of cantilevered, riserless plank treads, which runs up the SW wall of the room to two doors leading to a second floor loft. Under the staircase is a doorway leading to the bedrooms at the SW end of the house. The handrail is wood looped with thick rope.

The kitchen exhibits hand-made cupboards of unhewn half-logs, placed with the rounded sides outward. A trap door staircase originally led down to a storage room in the basement, but this has been covered as a safety measure. A pass-through to the dining room on the northwest wall of the kitchen measures approximately three feet long by two feet wide.

The dining room also has hand-made half-log cabinets. The pass-through has a small counter and double doors on the dining room side.

The first floor bedrooms have low ceilings of wormy chestnut boards and log walls. The loft has two doors on the landing, placed close together. The loft is one large room whose ceiling follows the roof line. The roof has sapling joists.

The basement area is divided into a large central section and a smaller combination bar/storage area at the northeast end. The large room has a stone floor and the panelling and ceiling are of wormy chestnut. A stone fireplace on the northeast wall is positioned underneath the fireplace on the upper floor. Northwest of the fireplace is a bar counter, while on the southeast side of the fireplace is a door to the bar/storage area. The storage area has half-log cabinets, and the trap door from the kitchen led down to this room. All doors throughout the house are wormy chestnut.

An outstanding feature of this house is its rustic setting. The driveway to the house is flanked by two stone pillars. On the northeast pillar is a metal plaque with the name "Mar-Jo Lodge" on it in raised letters. Beyond, the driveway makes a small loop with a small parking area on the northeast side of the house. A large well is positioned several yards from the southeast elevation and just off the east corner is a small storage shed which was originally an outhouse. A sunken, stone-floored terrace fills the ell on the southeast elevation. Much foliage, including pines and large rhododendrons, screen the house from its neighbors and give the house an atmosphere of privacy.
